Excerpt from Report of the Temporary Examiner of Public Records, 1909 It has also been at times necessary to suggest changes in construction of proposed vaults, which I have deemed would increase their efficiency, and I have always found architects and engineers engaged in such construction ready to listen to and embody in their plans any suggestion which looked to better protection. Some of this work of remodeling along the lines of increased efficiency has only been brought about after long. Endeavor. In two cases brought to a successful issue during the present year the effort for a change had extended over four years, but the results now obtained have justified the expenditure of time and effort. Methods have also been devised looking to better protection to certain classes of record, notably the legislation providing for promptly binding up all vital statistic returns so that all the returns for the past three years are easily accessible, while those of years preceding are for the most part a mass of mixed paper requiring great effort in order to find any desired returns and then with no certainty that the return had not been mislaid. The law requiring the placing of non-combustible fittings in vaults used for public records is part of the work of this office, and its effect has been good. The vaults in use have not all as yet been properly equipped, but in no instance have I known of a new vault which has not fully complied to the requirements of this statute. In forty-five towns has work been done by the silk process of repairs in addition to the ordinary rebinding of books. In nearly all of these towns...
